Joint Message on the Occasion of World Teachers’ Day

5 October 2005

On World Teachers’ Day 2005, we of the United Nations join parents and communities around the world in recognizing that quality teachers are critical for providing quality education. Through their daily work, teachers make a tremendous contribution to sustainable development by building its human foundation - developing a child’s capacity and desire to learn.

As we are all too aware, across the globe millions of children face many hardships, whether inadequate food, shelter or other basic physical and emotional needs. Many still face towering odds in acquiring a basic education. On World Teachers’ Day, we are also reminded of the challenge for teachers of imparting a good education to pupils based on high learning standards, and of making schools a welcoming, encouraging, and inclusive place in which all are treated with dignity and every child has the opportunity to reach his or her full potential.

Unfortunately, many of the world’s more than 60 million teachers, with over a billion children in their care, teach in very difficult circumstances. The majority work in developing countries, many in communities where there is an urgent need to improve teaching and learning conditions, to retain skilled teachers and to attract good candidates to become teachers. In every community, teachers -- like parents and children -- need to have their voice heard. Therefore, on this day, we urge that the voice of teachers be heard in shaping the education decisions which they themselves have to carry out.

Today is an opportunity to celebrate teachers. The best celebration is the practical one where we show, 365 days a year, our appreciation and understanding of the noble and complex work teachers do by working for the best possible teaching and learning conditions. And we can also decide to make today the day that each one of us says “Thank you” to at least one teacher.
